

Hi Nick Borelli & Laurie Van Asten,

I've read and appreciate your concerns with the proposed new single family home + accessory dwelling unit. We recognize that the proposed building's aesthetics, architecture, and materials are not common in the area, and could be potentially polarizing. When you are doing something different, there will be some that love it and others that will not. We respect your preferences and opinions, and we hope you'll also be respectful of ours and be tolerant with a building that is different.

Ultimately, what structures may or may not be built is defined by the city's land use, building, etc. codes. Meaning, if it meets code, then it may be built. The city has the important job of ensuring that the plans are to code, by reviewing them and issuing a building permit. Later, ensure that the structure is built to code, through inspections.

Building something new is hard, so we appreciate your patience and understanding as we work through it.

Thanks,
Sam & Shannon Adams
